Everybody uses Chrome, but I don't; Google is too powerful already, no need to feed the beast anymore. At most, I have a copy of Chromium¹ installed, as a last resort. Because I'm a faithful Firefox² user, and of course I install many extensions in it. Here are some of those that I systematically add to every computer I use.

- Dark Reader³ so that web pages automatically adapt to the current “Night Mode” of the computer. The official website⁴ explains it all, it's a great add-on.
- Facebook Container⁵ because I really don't want Facebook to track me at all.
- GNOME Shell Integration⁶ is a great way to easily install GNOME⁷ extensions in my system. But for this to work I remove the `snap` installation of Firefox, and install it via `apt`. I actually remove `snap` altogether from Ubuntu, if you ask me.
- Grammarly⁸ to make sure that what I write on the web is decent enough (unfortunately it's the only piece of the Grammarly⁹ system that actually works on Linux.)
- Joplin Web Clipper¹⁰ to save web pages into a Joplin¹¹ notebook.
- KeePassXC Browser¹² providing me with access to my KeePassXC¹³ database. Again, for this to work properly, both Firefox and KeePassXC need to be installed via `apt`, and not via `snap` of Flatpak¹⁴.
- uBlock Origin¹⁵ because it makes the web lighter and faster.

Also, I don't know if many people know about this, but there's a “Chromium
